Yard Talk If the air is dry enough to burn, it's too dry for the warblers that are here to live on it. The drought was still in effect when we came along. Rains came late this year, but right on schedule. Still, it hasn't been enough to wet out the parched soil. Without the moisture, birds have been drying out. Tens of thousands of western meadowlarks are here this winter, but not many are on the bare ground near our house. I'm sure they know how it feels. Mimic is a common name for the broad-tailed hummingbird. The captive birds are making their homes here. On the ground under our windows, the young purple martins look for insects for their moms. The hummingbird feeder was nearly empty when we returned from a trip to the country. There are plenty of grasshoppers on the feeder. Hummingbirds are smart birds. They know where to find the most succulent food. The bees don't think so. They'll eat anything they can find. The bee pollen is good for the birds, too. The early evening is the time for the wrens. They scold each other, as well as the jays. Most of the world's birds eat insects, but not all eat honey. A cardinal rests in the shade of a deciduous tree. The hummingbird is on the edge of a roof, where he'll chase away a cat. A cat can hurt a baby bird, but the hummers don't care. The cat can't catch the bird, or it won't let it go. The nest is under the cedar tree. A raccoon killed two
