Harry Potter Quidditch World Cup How To Change Language. Evolutionary adaptation of HIV-1 proteinase to reverse transcriptase. The human immunodeficiency virus type 1 proteinase, a zinc metalloprotease, cleaves proteins in the viral precursor polyproteins at the carboxy-terminal "sequence" and is essential for the maturation of the virus. In addition, the proteinase is believed to be the only enzyme in the virus with RNA-dependent RNA polymerase activity, a function which requires extensive protein sequence and domain homology. Computer modeling has predicted that human immunodeficiency virus type 1 reverse transcriptase contains at least two zinc-dependent proteolytic sites, one located at the base of the thumb subdomain of the fingers subdomain and a second located within the beta-barrel. The carboxy-terminal sequence of the proteinase contains homology to the region of reverse transcriptase believed to be responsible for the RNA-dependent RNA polymerase activity. On the basis of this structure-function analysis, we propose that evolution of the proteinase to function as an RNA-dependent RNA polymerase and the related changes in the beta-barrel have been driven by the need to efficiently process and recycle the nucleic acid products of viral DNA replication.[Development of a new intervention strategy for chronic hepatitis B carriers using alpha-interferon]. In Japan, while more than 5 million people suffer from chronic hepatitis B virus (HBV) infection, most of them are not treated with antiviral agents. The treatment strategy is as follows; 1) identify those who are responsive to interferon; 2) check their clinical course, if positive; 3) diagnose the cause of liver dysfunction.
