Escherichia coli O157:H7 is a growing problem in the food chain and may be associated with several gastrointestinal disorders, including hemorrhagic colitis, in humans. High levels of magnesium ions may be a requirement for the production of colicins, which are also encoded by E. coli O157:H7. To evaluate the effect of magnesium ions on colicin production, E. coli O157:H7 was grown with 1.0, 0.5, or 0.25 mM magnesium sulfate in a chemically defined medium. The growth of E. coli O157:H7 and the production of colicins were greater in the 0.25-mM treatment compared with the 1.0- and 0.5-mM treatments. However, levels of colicins and the total soluble protein in the bacterial growth medium were lower in the 0.25-mM treatment compared with the 1.0- and 0.5-mM treatments. One hundred fifty-five species from the Enterobacteriaceae family were tested for the effect of magnesium on colicin production. All of the strains from this family exhibited significantly greater resistance to the toxic effects of colicins in the presence of 0.25 mM magnesium compared with the resistance exhibited at 1.0 mM. The ability of E. coli O157:H7 to grow in the presence of 0.25 mM magnesium was accompanied by a decreased level of colicin production./* * Sample kset plugin * * Copyright (c) 2007, Jouni Malinen * * This software
