computer against unauthorized access. It allows you to . Q: Could PHP_EOL be misleading? In the vast majority of php projects that I've seen, PHP_EOL is used to indicate the line breaks that should be used to end a string, without whitespace. Yet in the following case, using this exact same code, it is adding an extra line break before the last character of the string: Hello World! If I enter the above into a browser's source view it renders as Hello World! Using a regular string without any whitespace does indeed remove the extra line break in the above case, but I'd like to understand why it's adding the extra line break here. A: According to the manual, a string does not have a by default; adding simply tells PHP to add a new line break when outputting that string. The only reason adding makes the string look better is if you are using a monospaced font. Your sample code is not using , so the is not adding anything. Q:

Unable to run a dockerized rails application in a java docker image I have a rails application that I am trying to run in a docker container. I am using docker compose to do this. This application is a rails app that needs to connect to a postgresql db that I have in a separate docker container. When I use docker to run this image I get the following error in my rails application: The method `addBinding(Class, String, String, String, String)` is undefined for the type `2d92ce491b`
