Main menu Post navigation Handheld Web Devices Raise Headlines At the recent Mobile World Congress, the likes of HTC, Nokia and Samsung unveiled a variety of mobile devices. One of these devices, which isn't even a phone and doesn't have a market to sell in, is the remote control. Imagine, you're driving a car, and you have to make a phone call to the office, or get a lift home. Then, instead of having a 2 dimensional screen, you have a multi-touch screen which allows you to interact with an interface much more easily, even more comfortably than is possible on a phone. One can only imagine what mobile video could do for the space constraints of a car. Google has even been working on a more integrated design for the remote control, integrating in-car electronics with the content you're watching.Q: How to disable the "click to add row" functionality in jqGrid without a button? The default behavior of jqGrid allows users to add additional rows by clicking on the last column of a cell on the first row, but I do not want them to be able to do that. I'd like to disable it. I know there's a button to do so but, I want a solution without a button. I have a column in the first row that has this functionality. When you click on that first column cell, a row appears below the first row that contains a checkbox and the last column, as shown in this image. I want to disable the click on the first column of the first row so users can't add rows this way, but I want the checkbox and the last column to be added in the first row. Any suggestions? A: In case you don't need additional functionality (like the selection of additional row by edit), the row add would be enough to use $('#list').jqGrid({ //... addbutton: true, add: function () { $('#list').jqGrid('addRowData', $(this).jqGrid('getGridParam','selrow')); return false; },
