Identification and Genomic Organization of the Human Multidrug Resistance Protein 9 (MRP8) Gene: Implications for the Focused Deletion Syndrome 47. The search for genes associated with high-risk behavior syndromes in humans has led to the identification of a large cluster of genes on chromosome 5 that are most likely involved in the etiology of the entire spectrum of reproductive and mental health disorders. These genes were first identified in research aimed at determining the genetic basis for the high-risk behavior of drug abuse. Subsequent evidence has identified the high-risk gene cluster as a hot spot for human chromosomal deletions, at a rate of >30 high-risk genes identified to date. Nomenclature for this haplotype of genes has been hindered by the lack of concordance for gene nomenclature across species, with the list of murine homologues not yet encompassing the complete set of genes for the cluster. Thus, the human homologue has been proposed as the MRP family. Once the human gene has been identified, the chromosomal deletion of the MRP8 locus has now been described in patients presenting with behavioral issues. Here, we report the first identification and genomic organization of the human MRP8 gene, and analyze the gene sequence to determine any apparent homology with other members of the MRP family. Achieving the "quality" representation of processed foods in free-choice assays using a novel in vivo chamber system. Chambers have become widely used in rodent behavioral assays. The majority of chambers have a small to moderate apparatus capacity that may not allow an accurate assessment of the consumption of a full-fat foodstuff. The current study aimed to develop a new in vivo assay system to determine the food intake of adult mice. A 3-bottle/chamber system containing access to water and two types of food was established. One access port contained either water only (virgin water) or full-fat milk only (virgin milk), and 09e8f5149f
