When the economy is working well, the government collects money from households, pays it to businesses to do things like building roads, and gives business owners interest-free loans to make new investments. If the government collects more money than it needs to pay out in interest-free loans, it is not spending all of it. Instead, it is financing some of its spending with money that the government is hiding somewhere. This hidden money exists because the government can print money. In fact, the government can print so much money that it is effectively monetizing its budget deficit because the government cannot collect all the taxes that it says it is collecting The debt would rise over time, because the government would have to pay back the interest on the money it spends. Without the debt, no one would need to borrow from banks. Homeowners would instead repay their mortgages. Still, to cut the budget deficit, the government would also have to spend less money on interest on government debt. The government can cut the deficit simply by cutting spending on things that interest.gov back to the government, such as the interest it pays to government bond buyers, without cutting spending on things like hospitals or police. Similarly, if the government has higher-than-expected tax revenues, it can pay back the interest the government has hidden in the debt, and cut its budget deficit. I've tried to keep it reasonably clean throughout. There are a few things I'd like to do now, however, which I'm not sure how best to do. First, there's a small area of my kitchen that's really unclean - as in, there is a lot of food debris, pet hair, etc. The area is fairly small, and I'd really like to pull up the carpet, wipe out and clean everything, and put down a new tile floor. I'd also like to clean the corners of the countertop, the dirt from the sink drain, and the tops of the appliances, especially the freezer. The kitchen is a small area, and I'm not sure how to clean the kitchen effectively without making it hard to cook in. Any other suggestions on tidying the area would be welcome as well! A: What I would do is have a large rubbermaid type container with a lint cloth ready for the next time something comes out of that sink that needs a clean. Then when you're ready to actually clean, you can just grab that container and go to town. I don't think there's really a limit as to how long you can clean up after yourself. I have this same situation, my wife loves to cook but doesn't like mess and doesn't want to clean up after herself. I would also buy a very inexpensive degreaser, about $3.00 per bottle, and wipe it around the sink and down the drain and anything else that needs degreasing. I would put baking soda on my dirty counters and leave it there overnight. If you wake up in the morning and it still looks dirty, then you can scrub it down with some inexpensive cleaning products that can be found at your local big box store, then rinse with a very small amount of water. If you notice a spot that's
