Expression of the vasoactive intestinal peptide receptor, VPAC(1), and its mRNA in the testis and epididymis of the rat: evidence for a unique vascular pattern. Vasoactive intestinal peptide (VIP) is an important regulatory peptide that plays an important role in the control of fluid transport in several tissues. In the rat epididymis, VIP is synthesized by principal cells and appears to induce cyclic adenosine monophosphate (cAMP) production and protein secretion. It has been shown that vasoactive intestinal peptide (VIP) acts via specific receptors coupled to adenylate cyclase. Using an antiserum specific for the VIP receptor type I (VPAC(1)), we have shown that the receptor is present on the principal cells of the epididymal epithelium. Using in situ hybridization and complementary DNA probes, we have identified the expression of mRNA for the VPAC(1) receptor in the rat testis. To examine the possible existence of a different expression of the VPAC(1) receptor at the vascular level, we combined both techniques and studied the distribution of the receptor mRNA and VIP-containing nerves in the testis and epididymis. VIP immunoreactive nerves were located within the vascular bundles of the vas deferens, vasculature of the tunica propria, and epididymal ducts. The specific expression of the VIP receptor on the male reproductive vasculature suggests a possible functional role for VIP in these structures. In the fields of automobile and marine engines, there is a trend toward increased fuel efficiency with a goal of reducing carbon dioxide emissions. The related technology of reducing friction in engine components, one of which is a bearing, has been developed actively in the past few decades. For example, Patent Literature 1 discloses an engine component bearing that reduces friction caused between inner and outer rings (bearings). Specifically, a polyether-based lubricant is used as the lubricant that includes: a polyester oligomer obtained from the reaction of an acid containing a polyester group and a polyether group; and a low-molecular weight component containing at least one kind of a polyether oligomer.
