Fasciola hepatica is the causative agent of fasciolosis, an important zoonosis transmitted to man through the consumption of contaminated raw or undercooked liver of mammals (including the cat) and other fauna. The aim of this study was to investigate the distribution of rostellar structures in the digestive system of the cat (Felis catus L.) naturally infected with F. hepatica. For this purpose, the upper part of the small intestine was examined and a number of parasitological and histological criteria were used in order to confirm the infection. All the animals were killed with the aim of removing the liver for morphologyological and parasitological analyses. The results showed that rostellar structures were found in the pyloric and antral portions of the stomach, in the duodenum and at its proximity, in the jejunum, in the ileum, in the proximal portion of the colon and in the liver.
