Widget Engine Get the most out of your Computer's most used utilities. When a new operating system was released Microsoft bundled a multitude of applications with the system. These utilities enhanced the user experience and became the access points for many an experienced user. The same is true for Mac OS X where although Apple supplies a number of the most popular applications, many users prefer to use the utilities that have been bundled with Apple's operating system from day one. In this article I will start out with a generic overview of utilities and then feature a handful that I feel were important when the OS was first released. Generic utilities The most generic utilities are ones that would apply to any window manager or desktop environment. These include the application launcher, task manager, system monitor, disk usage analyzer and so forth. These work exactly the same regardless of the OS. Some of these are preinstalled and others are included as bundled applications. A very useful one is the Windows calculator which can do almost any calculation. Bundled Applications Most operating systems come with a number of bundled applications. These are mostly to do with system administration. Browsers are available but are very common. The Office suite is also fairly common. Others include, things like accounting, programing and general purpose utilities. AirPort Utility includes and can detect wireless base stations and routers. Internet Explorer is the standard browser for Windows and a very common bundled utility. Safari for the Mac is very similar to Internet Explorer. QuickTime Player is an essential for video viewing. Application Launcher This is really only an advantage for Microsoft operating systems where it is called the start menu. It is an application launcher, so that all applications are accessible from one menu. Any shortcuts that you place there are also in other windows and applications. For example, you could have shortcuts to web browser, email clients and so forth.
