Q: why is the syslog message repeated multiple times when i have a single network interface I'm trying to learn to troubleshoot my Ubuntu, so I'm not asking for a hand holding. I have a single network interface in my system. I found the `syslog_redirect.conf` uid=1000 file `/var/log/syslog` I reloaded the daemon. If I set the syslog server to remote host: `syslog-ng /var/log/syslog remote:/var/log/syslog.error` I get the following message twice. Dec 18 23:16:01 myhost kernel: [38312.864001] company.comname: port 1 (tcp) bound to 127.0.0.1 (127.0.0.1) I'm not asking for help, I just want to know why this message is shown twice. As a result, I can't understand why this message is shown twice. A: The kernel doesn't match the rule twice. The first time it matches, the `syslog_redirect` is set, the message is logged at the syslog server location, and the kernel starts listening for the matching message (it'll generate the "company.comname: port 1" line). The 2nd time, the kernel catches the matching message, but the `syslog_redirect` is already set. Thus, the kernel is not generating a message anymore (and is never set to listen to messages), so the message is not forwarded to the syslog server, and is just written in `syslog_file` location. Q: Filtering data in Pandas I have a dataframe which looks like this: `df = 0`

What's New In?

On Tuesday, December 20th, the American Sustainable Business Council (ASBC) in a statement announced the release of a set of questions to Congress that are specifically intended to highlight the need to address sustainable investment in the U.S. economy and to amplify the voices of those in the investment community who share a vision of vibrant and resilient communities. “The U.S. economy has a significant sustainability deficit — at least in the eyes of the investment community,” said Neil Arora, senior associate at the Rhodium Group and co-author of the new questions. “Private investors are under increasing pressure to consider the impact their investments have on people and planet, and on our broader environment,” he continued. “From small fund managers, to large endowments, to the most well-known asset managers, investors are calling for action to make progress in this area.” As part of this call to action, ASBC is releasing the results of its first-of-its-kind survey, “America’s Sustainable Investment Future.” This survey included responses from more than 2,200 private investors, asset managers, academics, government officials and think-tanks to explore investor perspectives on investment into the future of a clean, healthy and prosperous America. The ASBC members of the survey suggest to Congress the following investments should be prioritized in order to realize the sustainable investment goals outlined in the report, “The Sustainable Investment Destination 2020: A roadmap for corporate America and American investors to tackle climate change and the other great challenges facing the nation.” As noted in the report, one of the central goals of the Sustainable Investment Destination 2020 program is to direct private investment away from fossil fuels and investments that contribute to climate change and toward investments that contribute to the wellbeing of people, the environment, and the shared prosperity of our economy. This survey was commissioned by the American Sustainable Business Council and conducted by the Rhodium Group through 2017. “We have an incredible opportunity to shape the direction of the investment community, and this report clearly lays out the opportunities for private investors to realize their potential to play an important role in achieving the environmental and social goals outlined in “The Sustainable Investment Destination 2020”,” said Kristin Palmer, ASBC chair and investment lead at the Aspen Institute. “This report is a very important step in positioning the United States as a country that is invested in the wellbeing of its people,
