A: In line 232, you seem to have forgotten the return statement, as well as the variable statement. Take a look. `$php =~ s/;/;/g; $file = basename($php); $f = fopen($file, 'rb') or die ("Could not open file '$file' to upload."); if (fseek($f, 0, SEEK_END) === -1 || ftell($f) ".htmlentities($tmp_file_contents).""; } Q: By multithreading, can I execute a background process in java I have an image processing code in which there will be some interruptions that should be treated by a background worker thread. I am wondering if by extending Thread or ExecutorService can I design a thread that can be killed from the UI that will do the job of this background thread? A: Thread is not a general purpose construct for handling interruption. In particular it is not restartable because it is a daemon thread. In this sense, it is not a proper model for code that needs to be executed even if the thread is interrupted. If what you need is interruptible execution of long running task, you should look at Executors.newSingleThreadScheduledExecutor(). Eye-tracking analysis of the relationship between sex`

Before the test function, there is a header file with some global variables. I am using Visual C++. In the test function, I need to read from a file the line number of a certain test and access this test file line from within the test function. I can not create a local variable to store the line number (this doesn't seem possible?). I am not sure how to access a specific line. Here is an example of what I'm trying to do: main file: int main(){ file
