The European Commission (EC) has published a consultation paper in the Official Journal of the European Union on ways for the European Union and its Member States to improve their corporate governance frameworks to respond to the current financial and economic challenges. The paper sets out a long-term governance strategy for the EU and identifies main trends and challenges facing the EU and its Member States. This article serves as a guide, rather than a definitive source. Therefore, no guarantee is made or promise intended that the statements in this article and any other document or web page operated by Timothy Mark LLC and Timothy Mark trademarks and logos are correct and free from legal error. The flexible grid layout of Timothy illustrates a grid system that can be used in a variety of ways such as reactive and adaptive grids which 'compose' differently at different times and places. This grid can be used for all types of grid systems regardless of the content (Dilger 246). Timothy describes flexbox as a grid system that allows designers to use the basic grid structure to create grid structures within the grid structure. Therefore, we see that the flexible grid layout is essential to a modern web design. The problem is finding a solution for grid layout. The free layout frameworks do not have the capabilities to change the grid through JavaScript. In fact, most JavaScript grid libraries are not flexible at all. Typically, in order to change the grid structures, you must rebuild the entire layout on the client side. But in order to create a flexible grid, you must break out of the templates you are given, such as the template.js and foundation.min.js. You must be able to use JavaScript to create a solution that works within a grid structure of the template. The solution should be a solution that is standard and does not require the entire page to be rebuilt. We believe that the flexbox solution hits that mark.
